Anth 338: Food, Place, and Power

Sociology & Anthropology

This course is intended to inform students about the relationship among food, place, and power. We will explore how people, places, governments, and economies are connected through food systems, and how those connections are made possible. In addition to considering the modern (industrial) food system, we'll consider alternatives to it and how those alternatives are also made to account for social, political, and ecological concerns.
